We're keeping an eye on the situation.Cordless phones are ugly, clunky, often-frustrating anachronisms that might seem like antique additions to modern homes. And most cordless phones are made by the same two manufacturers, with vanishingly few differences among the many mediocre models. Still, cordless phones remain popular, and they can be extremely helpful in an emergency or in homes with poor cell reception. After testing 12 top candidates, we're sure AT&T's DL72210 is the best old-fashioned handset. This two-phone package has respectable range and sounds better than any other handset we tested. It also offers premium features such as smart call blocking and a Bluetooth cell phone connection at a non-premium price.If you have mild to moderate hearing loss, we also have an amplified cordless phone pick for you.This phone offers good range, great voice quality, and more features than most others at this price.*At the time of publishing, the price was $55.AT&T's DL72210 offers plenty of range, great sound quality, and the full list of modern features. In our tests, we were able to walk seven houses down the street (more than 250 feet) before the connection began to cut out; that should be more than enough distance for most people. Our testing panel rated the DL72210's voice quality the highest of all the models we tested, as it even beat an iPhone used with Wi-Fi calling. And this two-handset package includes features—such as smart call blocking and Bluetooth pairing to your cell phone—normally found only on higher-end models.The KX-TGM420W's higher volume levels can help people with mild to moderate hearing loss, and its tone adjustment may make understanding speakers easier.*At the time of publishing, the price was $93.Panasonic's KX-TGM420W is the first phone that most people with hearing loss should consider. We tested three amplified phones with retired audiologist Lisa Devlin, who herself has hearing loss, and we found the KX-TGM420W to offer a significant volume range and suitable tone-adjustment options—both important features for those experiencing hearing loss. Although you can find phones that get louder, their extra volume isn't necessary for everyone, and they cost about twice as much. Our recommended handset is compatible with hearing aids and includes a jack for an optional headset or neck loop. Like our other picks, it offers good range and clear outgoing-voice quality, among other standard phone features. "I think that if I were still a practicing clinician and I had a client who was looking for a landline, I would recommend the 420," Devlin said after her evaluation. There might be better options depending on your individual hearing needs, though.This model is great if you need only a clear-sounding phone without any bells or whistles. It's an ideal candidate to keep around in case of an emergency.If you're looking for a barebones cordless phone that can make calls from a landline or cable-company VoIP line—and that's it—go with the VTech CS6114. For the price of a typical smartphone case, you get a no-frills phone with reasonable range and voice clarity but no call blocking, no speakerphone, and no answering system. The CS6114 is as basic as cordless phones get, but it could be the perfect choice if you just want to have a home phone available in case of emergencies.This phone has every feature you could want, as well as the longest range of any model we tested.VTech's IS8151-4 is the cordless phone for those who want a wealth of features and don't need an amplified phone. It offers all the same features as AT&T's DL72210 does, plus a dial pad and speakerphone on the base, and the package comes with four handsets. Also, this phone stayed connected over a longer distance than any other model we tested, starting to cut out only after 450 feet (or the length of one and a half football fields). Choosing the right cordless is important and it depends on what you need with your phone. While you're making the decision, look for the following things: Look for features: Make sure that the features that the company claims their phone has, really exist. Also, make sure you need these features on your phone. For example, a speakerphone, caller ID, a headset jack, and ringer are important features you always need in your phone. More talk time with crystal clear voice: Most important is that your cordless phone should provide at least 8 hours of talk time without needing to recharge. And the sound should be very clear as the mobile phone's voice quality isn't that good so your cordless should provide premium voice quality. Design: If you are interested in buying a cordless phone then pick it up and check whether it fits in your hand well. Is the design contemporary and easy to handle? If yes, then that cordless phone is a great choice for you. Price and return policy: Look for the phone that has as many features as you want, but don't get extravagant. Also, make sure you know the return policy in case your phone does not function properly. is the best cordless phone for home use? VTech and Panasonic provide some of the best cordless phones that can be used for a long time with a clear voice. What is the best brand for cordless phone? In terms of quality and design, Panasonic provides premium quality cordless phones. But you have to see what features you want in your cordless and buy one accordingly. How long should a cordless phone last? A cordless phone should last for at least 1 to 2 years if it's of a good brand. It depends on how you maintain your phone and is it of good quality or not. If you find your new phone not working properly then contact the vendor and exchange it. Should I leave my cordless phone on the charger all the time? Once the phone is fully charged, you can still leave it on the charger as there are no harmful effects. What is the best cordless phone in 2020? Panasonic provides some of the best cordless phones in the year 2020. You could also look for other brands as they also have some great phones. Check out our other articles:
